PROFESSOR ACCURACY

"Thirty years of my life, the best years of my youth, I have given to the Army," wailed Sergeant Max Graff. "And now they do this to me. You'd think I was a raw recruit, the kind of a guy who never saw a gun in his life. I can take apart any kind of a gun and put it back blind-folded. They can't do this to me. I know General Henderson. Bet if I wrote a letter to him, he'd listen to my complaint."

The soldier, who for the moment seemed to be ready to shed tears, didn't look like the kind of an army man who was given to emotion. He was six feet two in his socks, weighed about 182 pounds, was broad shouldered, slim hipped, and muscularly powerful. A profusion of wavy black hair with just a touch of gray set off his high forehead. He turned to his buddy, Jim Nolan, a corporal, for some understanding in the moment of his deepest grief. But Jim was puzzled. He didn't know what it was all about. He took a guess.

"After all these years, you mean they busted you?"

"Worse than that," replied the sergeant. "Here I have been in charge of the shooting range all these years. Know how many soldiers I have taught to shoot everything from the Springfield to the Garand? If they stood side by side, I bet they would reach from here to far out there. Now I know from nothing! They sent a professor from Washington to teach these guys some kind of new crackpot idea about shooting. Professor Samuel Snyder. He's the guy with a lot of degrees, and he wrote a dozen books. Got to be nice to him or the Major will be sore. Come on with me to the recreation hall. He's going to start talking to the first batch of victims in about ten minutes. Thirty poor kids are going to learn to shoot from a guy who writes books."

The two men walked slowly over to the recreation hall. They entered and noticed the seated recruits who were facing a thin small man of undetermined age. He could have been thirty or forty. The two were in time to hear him start speaking.

"I have spent the last five years," began Professor Snyder, "concluding what every soldier knows — that the best way to learn to shoot is to shoot with real bullets. At this Army Camp, the method has been to give you dry-shooting instruction, then let you shoot with bullets. You should learn to shoot from the start with bullets. And not only at bull's eye targets, but at silhouette targets which will appear unexpectedly at various distances — for in actual warfare you must be prepared to shoot an enemy or an object, and that is what I am going to teach you to do."

The next day the thirty soldiers were out at the range. Sergeant Graff went up to Professor Snyder.

"Is there anything I can do, sir?"

"In half an hour I want you to teach these men the nomenclature of the rifle. Then turn them over to me."

The Sergeant took a rifle which he held up so all the soldiers could see. Then slowly he pointed to the various parts namely, the receiver, the barrel, the action, the stock, the fore-end, the bore, the muzzle, the breech, the chamber, the sights, and other parts of the gun. When finished, he again asked if there was anything else he could do.

"Have your crew work the pits," said the Professor. "Set up the standard targets. You needn't use indicators to tell each man where his shot landed. A scope is being provided for each soldier so he can see where his shot has landed."

For the next two hours the men started to learn actual shooting in different positions. They shot prone, standing, and kneeling. Unlimited ammunition was given to them. When they finished they were tired but contented.

"The Prof knows his stuff," remarked Private Ben Marcus to Private Paul Ollan.

"How do you know?" challenged the Sergeant who happened to overhear that comment.

"Because I was on the rifle team in my high school," replied Private Marcus with a grin on his face. "This guy is no phony. I'll bet he has some good ideas up his sleeve."

The next day was a shocker for the Sergeant. It seemed the Professor had a special crew work on part of the firing range setting up silhouette targets.

"You are now going to shoot at little figures that will pop up any place on the range," Professor Snyder told the men. "This is to simulate what you would face under real firing conditions and I'll keep score."

The men got two hours of this training and enjoyed it. But the Sergeant had a beef and he spilled it to the Professor.

"Isn't that kind of wasteful? Won't giving every soldier all the bullets he wants make him careless?"

"Exactly the kind of thinking we had three-quarters of a century ago," scolded the Professor. "In those days they opposed the use of anything but a single shot rifle for soldiers. Why? Because they said it would make a soldier careless if he could shoot more than one bullet from his gun, using up all his ammunition. General Custer's men had single shot rifles. He could have taken Gatling Guns into battle with him. Rapidity of fire power plus accuracy are the keynote of victory. Had General Custer been able to use those Gatling Guns, he might have produced a startling victory."

The Sergeant said nothing then. But later he passed one little remark to some of the men.

"Funny about the Professor he teaches you fellows how to shoot, but so far he hasn't shot a gun himself."

"So what?" snapped back Private Ollan. "My pop was a swimming coach never went into the pool, but he turned out winning team after winning team. Tomorrow, the Professor has something new for us."

The next day the Professor put one soldier behind the wheel of a jeep, and two in the back with rifles. He cleared the area, then gave his orders.

"See how you can shoot from a bouncing jeep at silhouette targets."

It wasn't easy at first, but they soon got the knack of it after suggestions by the Professor. Corporal Jim Nolan was convinced that the Professor knew his stuff.

"Why don't you admit that you aren't the only good guy on the range?" he asked his buddy.

"When I see the kind of shooting that guy does, then I'll eat my shoes if he can hit the bull's eye," snarled Sergeant Graff.

The next day, which was Friday, was a day dear to the hearts of every man in the camp for it was pay day. The Professor was holding a Garand in his hand, and was ready to hand it to one of the soldiers, when a woman ran up to him.

"They just robbed the PX and took all the cash. I was on my way to do my typing when I looked through the window. See that car heading down the road? The three crooks are in it."

"Get on the phone and notify them at the gates," ordered the Professor in a military-like voice. "That car is going down the side road. When it gets within my range, I'll handle it."

The black sedan travelled madly and it came within the sights of the Garand.

"Objective, Gas Tank!" shouted the Professor.

"There she goes!" shouted the young lady.

The tank was riddled and started to burn. The driver of the car realized the seriousness of the situation. He brought the car to a stop, and the three men dashed out. One was carrying a sack.

"Lay down a barrage of bullets around them, but do not shoot them," ordered the Professor.

The soldiers went for their guns. They quickly loaded them and followed instructions. Within two minutes the three bewildered men were doing their best to signal they wanted to surrender.

An hour later Sergeant Graff was trying to make himself understood.

"I had the wrong opinion of you sir. Being an army man, I only wanted an army man to do what you did."

The Professor laughed, and when he smiled he extended his hand.

"There's trouble starting in Korea. I'll be back in the Army with my old rating of Colonel. Together we'll start a modern shooting program."

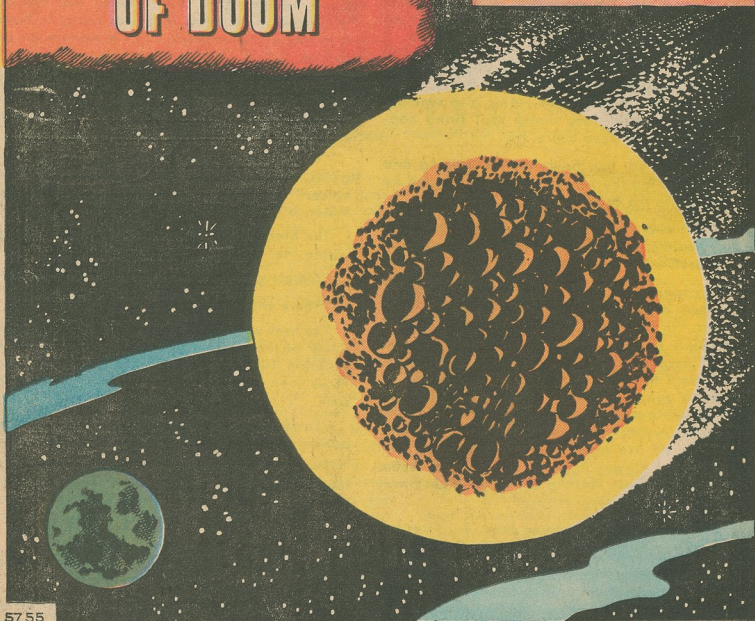

In Korea they called the soldiers trained by the ex-Professor, "Snyder's Sharpshooters." They could hit with uncanny accuracy almost any object seen by the human eye.

One thing bothered Sergeant Graff and this he told his buddy.

"He's the greatest guy in the world. So I thought I would read one of his books. Know what he writes? Not psychology — not shooting — but poetry. You figure that one out."
